

What do you do if the HR person doing the initial screening of you for a position says that the salary range is lower than what you believe the position is worth?? Do you go through the next interviews and not mention salary??

Answering The Salary Question

I find this is a one way street question and employers don't give the range of the position (if it wasn't already stated in the posting)

Is this an appropriate time to negotiate higher responsibilities to justify a higher salary expectation?

What if the salary was higher than what you know they can pay and you are willing to take a pay-cut but prefer not to go too low?

when giving a range for salary expectations should we use a 5-10 thousand range or a smaller range?

I have heard that companies will use this information from online job apps to set their own payroll and not to hire anyone at all. Is that true?

Can you say you are flexible depending on if or what benefits are available?

What if I have 20 year experience in management for example but I'm changing industry: am I considered a newbie for salary or is my experience in the other industry taken in consideration?

Do you include paid benefits in that total?

Summary

Questions?

Are you better equipped to handle this question?

would the person interviewing you have an idea of what you are expecting based on your experience? For example you have 20 yrs experience so they will know you are expecting a higher salary...

Can you ask what the salary range is for the position?

What if salary is also based on other benefits including time based or Retirement/Continuing education?

I've been told not to disclose previous salary with a potential

If a salary range was mentioned and you said ok during the HR interview, can you ask if there is flexibility when you receive an offer letter? This is the scenario when you know the salary they are offering is low.

Answering The Salary Question

can you make a lump sum statement ie. my total pay was X including bonus and discuss vacation?

You suggested to go lower and not price yourself out of the running, but how do you not shoot yourself in the foot and end up with a lower salary than planned?

Don't most contracts prevent you from sharing your salary at your previous company?

Where does negotiating stage come if it is that 10-20,000 range is being discussed...

If I am looking for a 20% jump from my previous job, how will most interviewers think? Will they think that I am just looking for financial improvement and not really interested in the job?

can you make a lump sum statement ie. my total pay was X including bonus and discuss vacation?

Would it hinder your chances by not answering?

When you are giving a range, you should give the range including all benefits, right? So total compensation.

When you ask someone what they made previously, what do you see is a bad answer to that question?

So should we push back then?! Especially if we want more income and we have the knowledge for it?

Summary

Questions?

Are you better equipped to handle this question?

How do you answer a question like what makes you unique?

How do you respond to a questions as to if you are overqualified?

Answering Why Should We Hire You

How do you answer a question like what makes you unique?

Should you be concerned about repetition when you go through several rounds of interviews

If you have had a job in a different sector than what you are applying for is that question still relevant?

When asked about references. Any recommendations on the response?

Summary

Questions?

Are you better equipped to handle this question?